STANDING UP INSTEAD OF SITTING BACK
(The impact of our decision to accommodate in 2005)

In 2005 NCATL hosted the National High School Mock Trial Competition (NHSMTC) in Charlotte. It took more than 3 years to plan this 3 day event. Teams from 42 states and two territories were only 6 weeks away from coming to Charlotte for the big event when a request came from New Jersey to change the competition dates. As it turned out, New Jersey's State Championship team was from an Orthodox Jewish high school - The Torah Academy. The students could not compete from sunset Friday through darkness Saturday due to their religious observances. They had earned the right to compete, but the schedule prohibited their meaningful participation. While it was impossible to change dates so close to the event, NCATL, in spite of fierce opposition by the national competition board, came up with and implemented a reasonable accommodation that would allow the Torah Academy to fully compete. We knew we did the right thing then. We saw it in the faces of the Torah Academy team and their families. We saw it in the faces of the rest of the students who learned the importance of making this kind of accommodation.

After the 2005 competition, the NHSMTC board resolved never to make such an accommodation again. Our NC representatives on the national board resigned and NC and NJ pulled out from the NHSMTC and joined forces to start our own national competition known as the American Mock Trial Invitational (AMTI).

This issue was revisited in Atlanta this past spring when The Maimonides School won the Massachusetts State Championship and faced the same issue with NHSMTC that New Jersey faced in 2005. Unfortunately, the Georgia host did not take a stand. In the end the Maimonides School fought for an accommodation and won. Jeffrey Kosowsky is a parent of one of the Maimonides School team members (Michael Kosowsky) and an alumnus of the Maimonides School in Brookline, Massachusetts. He shares with us below their decision to stand up instead of sitting back and what role our stand in 2005 played in that decision and in winning the accommodation:

*Perhaps surprisingly, the initial reaction of many of the Maimonides School parents and students was a mix of disappointment and resigned understanding that perhaps nothing could be done to allow our students to participate while observing the Jewish Sabbath without seriously disrupting the entire tournament schedule. The students were still excited about winning the Massachusetts state championship. Believing that there was no alternative, the team accepted the fact that at the 2009 Atlanta championship they would be forced to forfeit the Saturday rounds and give up on any chance of winning or even placing in the top half. Such is the price that sometimes must be paid for remaining faithful to one's beliefs and traditions. However, our reaction changed from acceptance to dogged activism as we learned about the noble behavior of the North Carolina Trial

Terry Sanford State Championship Team 2006

The Mock Trial program has been an invaluable part of my curriculum since starting our AP US Government and Politics course in 2000. We have fielded at least one team every year since except one. We have even had as many as 8 teams in one year. Although all of our teams weren't successful in terms of the competition each student learned a great deal about the law and the legal profession. I have been extremely fortunate to have two outstanding attorneys serve as my coordinators. They have coached teams themselves, but also helped find other attorneys to coach additional teams. Randy Gregory worked tirelessly for years to help build the program. He is the one who found attorney-coaches for those eight teams. During his tenure, we won 9 regionals and were state runners-up in 2001. After a year off, Scott Flowers stepped in and helped us win two more regionals and the 2006 State Championship. Without those two men it would have been difficult to keep our program going.

The students who have participated have all gone on to college and most are doing very well. Many have graduated and moved into careers. It has been interesting to note how many chose political science or law as a major. All of these students have benefited from their participation because they developed confidence in public speaking and enhanced their ability to think on their feet. I was relieved to hear that the program will remain intact because I have come to rely on it to hone leadership and speaking skills, as well as help develop confidence in students in ways that just cannot be replicated in a normal classroom environment. I wish we'd had this program when I was in school. I hope more schools will become involved. Everyone associated with this program should be proud of the quality product that has been produced for all of these years!

WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

Lionel Earl - Mock Trial impacting his future!

My name is Lionel Earl and I was fortunate enough to have the chance to participate in Mock Trial at Terry Sanford High School in Fayetteville. The complex and competitive nature of the program pushed me to develop skills of critical thinking and public speaking. My mentorship and exposure to the legal field influenced me to seek a liberal arts education as a possible foundation for Law School. But perhaps more importantly, I had fun with my friends learning about the court system and I suspect I will fondly look back at the memories I created during this time.

I am currently a sophomore at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and I am pursuing a degree in Political Science. The skills and confidence I gained in High School Mock Trial has allowed me to pursue opportunities such as the Southeast Asia Summer (SEAS) Program where I am now studying abroad in Singapore and Thailand. In Mock Trial, I gained the ability to think deeply about a subject and argue both sides; this has become essential to the discussions and debates in my International Migration and Citizenship course.

Continuing with my passion for Mock Trial, I joined the organization at UNC last year. Having met some success and support from my colleagues, I am now a captain on the Carolina Mock Trial team and I look forward to mentoring and teaching younger members about the organization. In addition to this, Mock Trial opened the way for me to join other related activities. For example, I am now a counsel on the UNC Attorney General Staff in which I take real cases involving students violating the Honor System. In this way, I have found a way to apply my skills to help the university community. Needless to say, I am grateful for the openings that my experience in Mock Trial has provided and I hope that others will continue to have the chance to participate in the program.
